

Martinů's mature orchestral works are now a mainstay of the repertoire. But the generous quantity of orchestral music he wrote between his late teens and early thirties is as good as unknown; some of it, indeed, has never even been performed. That's the case with the ballet Stín ('The Shadow') from 1916, which has its world premiere in this recording – astonishingly, in view of the quality of the music it contains. Although the action of the ballet is dark – a girl dances with her shadow in the presence of Death – Martinů's score presents a series of remarkably buoyant and cheery dances.

Reviews of Volume One in this series

'Ian Hobson proves a wholly sympathetic interpreter, securing fine, idiomatic performances throughout from Sinfonia Varsovia, in excellent sound. It may not be Martinů as we know it, but this is a hugely enjoyable, fascinating disc.'

Guy Rickards, Klassisk Musikkmagasin

'Whatever the problems involved in the transcription and/or completion of these orchestral scores, [...] the end result is a stunning vindication of hard work plus an inspired interpreter. [...] Hobson's deeply ingrained sensitivity as a performer comes through in everything he does.'

Lynn René Bayley, Fanfare

'gosh these pieces are lovely. [...] It made me happy – it's an hour of sheer aural satisfaction, and it's downright bizarre that this music isn't better-known. Treat yourself!'

Brian Reinhart, MusicWeb International
